

Big tech's alarming online monopoly, repeated technical failures, user data leaks on a global scale (Yahoo!, Facebook Cambridge Analytica, Equifax, Home Depot) and a lack of security due to Internet centralization combined, make the Internet an increasingly unreliable and vulnerable space.

Over the past few years, a growing number of engineers and researchers have been working and finally finding solutions for these problem. We now find ourselves at the dawning of a new online age, with a decentralized, blockchain-based Internet known as Web3. Which will be based on decentralized protocols that run on blockchain technology. Blockchain-based assets known as utility tokens represent a stake in the open source network. For the first time one can invest directly into the future protocols of the internet.

Financial incentives for open source developers and peer to peer network users lead to novel applications, fast iteration, permission-less innovation and disintermediation. Blockchain assets financially reward early network adopters if the network expands. Since the asset appreciates as demand for the network increases, users of the network are also the stake holders... Time is now.

As the crypto-market is currently valued at somewhere between $120bn and $150bn, it is accounting for 0.2% of the global stock market ($64trn). If we work from the principle that many public companies will gradually be replaced by their decentralized competitors, it makes sense to believe that what we are looking at will be one of the biggest transfers of wealth that history will ever see.
